What Lies Ahead?

The first half of 2022 delivered super-strong New York City markets: The second quarter delivered double-digit pricing, closed sales volume and transaction count growth compared to Q2 2021.

In any market we should explore where we have come from, where we are and then evaluating where we're heading. With signed contract volume down in the past 6 weeks, we can be certain the impact of rising interest rates and sharply lower equity markets has already impacted buyer mood....and affordability for some. Some areas of the NYC markets are over-supplied while others are UNDER-supplied. Some properties are fairly priced, while others are not. Real Estate markets are HYPER-localized. Now more than ever using the services of a fully supported, professional real estate advisor affiliated with a powerful brand/company who can help you identify specific insights and data most pertinent to your specific needs and goals is the key. Most reports and data focused on medians and averages are simply useless.

Interest rates have risen faster than at any other time in recent history, a shock to the system not too dissimilar to COVID and the Russia-Ukraine war. May data suggests slowing consumer spending and most retailers are over-supplied and on sale....which will only show up later, many weeks after it happened.

Not unlike all shocks to the system, there's usually a pause to adjust to a 'new normal'....'normalizing' markets after extreme markets can be good for all. Life and real estate adjust quite swiftly ...and then life marches on.

Did You Know?

Some Mortgage interest rates soared above 5%....in 2018.

02

Second/weekend/vacation homes can be expensive, but the '2-week rule' allows tax-free rental income that can offset costs....

03

Higher interest rates can deliver bigger $$$ tax deductions, limited to the $750k max. Those dollars can offset higher interest rates.

04

Mortgage rates on the east and west coasts are often lower than elsewhere because of more competition.
